John Farrow has been wrongly accused of murdering his wife Christine and a local TV crew is interviewing him to clear his name. A young girl, who was watching television at the time of the quake, has a vision of the lava bubbling up in her room. Later, she finds her father, wounded and bleeding. She takes him to her home, but her parents are also missing and as the lava from the fissure continues to flow she awakens the next morning to find her parents in her room. Over the next few days, mysterious voices emanate from the lava. The events of Volcano have been compared to the 1953 film The Thing from Another World. Plot John Farrow is a physician and a single parent. At home, his daughter Suzanne stays awake most nights in order to see her favorite TV program. As she watches, the news begins with an earthquake that causes the TV to break. John watches with her. A reporter climbs a hill to film the lava in a fissure. When the reporter reaches the top of the hill, he falls through the crust of the earth. A scared little girl, Christine, runs home with a dead cat in her arms. She tells her mother and father about the earthquake and then watches from a window as they climb a hill to film lava. When they return, Christine's parents are missing. John is interviewed by a local news station about the missing children. He is then interviewed by the police who accuse him of murdering his wife, Christine, and the three children in the house at the time of the earthquake. John is then placed in jail to await trial. At home, Suzanne wakes up in the middle of the night and begins to see visions of the lava bubbling up from beneath her bed. The visions appear to be a message to her, but she can't understand what it is. Christine, who is visiting her father in jail, offers to help her. Together they follow the lines of light. At the local TV station, John is returned to his cell and the girl watches from a window as the lava from the fissure continues to flow. John and Christine arrive at the fissure. They find a little girl who has been deafened by the noise of the volcano. Christine makes her understand that there is nothing to be afraid of. As they leave the area, they see a group of children with the mother holding their hands. They tell the children to run to the surface 82157476af
